

Essays and Other Writings (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Essays and Other Writings
I am startled that God can make me so rich even with my own cheap stores. It needs but a few wisps of straw in the sun, some small word dropped, or that has lain long silent in some book. When heaven begins and the dead arise no trumpet is blown. Perhaps the south wind will blow. - Thoreau.
The fact is I am a mystic, a transcendentalist, and a natural philosopher to boot, wrote Thoreau on one occasion (March 5, 1853) in his diary, briefly summing himself up in a formula. It would be an error to lay stress on a casual passage such as this, but the more one reads of the daily entries which Thoreau made in that journal intime which he so consistently kept throughout his life, the more one is impressed by the fundamental quality of his mysticism, how deeply it was rooted within him, how powerfully and constantly its influence predominated with him.
