Not illustrated. 1880 edition. Excerpt: ...membranes, and thus cause retention of a part or the whole. Plug the vagina for hemorrhage, as suggested by Dewees, with a large sponge filled with vinegar. Astringents are sometimes given with good effect, as acetate of lead, gallic acid, and the mineral acids. In more advanced pregnancy, oxytocics come into use. A simple enema or one containing turpentine will aid to excite uterine contractions. The placenta generally occasions the most difficulty. When this is retained, and the os closes, we must wait; the finger cannot be introduced, and ergot is of no use. Symptoms must be met as they arise. When dilatation occurs, or severe flooding demands action, careful effort must be made to bring away any portion that may protrude. More reliance should be placed upon fingers than instruments. After an abortion, the health should be built up by tonics as demanded, and fatigue and exertions should be avoided for a while. ALFRED MEADOWS, M. D., OF LONDON. Ergot is exhibited by this author in habitual abortion dependent upon a weakened atonic condition of the uterus (Practitioner, September, 1868). He commences in small doses (Tflv-viiij extracti ergota; liquoris, British Pharmacopoeia), as soon as pregnancy is known to exist, and continues it in increasing doses (Ttlxx-xxx), as long as it may seem necessary, certainly till after the period of the accustomed abortion, but with the occasional omission of a week or two. In unsuitable cases, this mode of treatment may be productive of mischief; for, as Dr. Meadows remarks, its employment is a matter of extreme delicacy, requiring a very careful discrimination of the cause of previous abortions, and of the actual present condition of the uterus. On the general use of opium in abortion, it may be...
