

Indians in a Globalizing World: Their Skewed Ride

The opening up of the Indian economy in 1991 decisively brought the country into the age of globalization and there has been no turning back the policies set in motion by the Congress and later carried forward by the Bharatiya Janata Party have shaped the country over the last two decades not just its economy but also its culture and society. Places like Gurgaon transformed from nondescript towns to luxury-living addresses almost overnight. Indian IT firms earned renown and respect abroad, while big names such as the Tatas and Mittals grabbed headlines with high-profile overseas acquisitions. Those that managed to find a place in the enlarging yet shrinking global world have prospered but increasing numbers of farmers and adivasis, migrants and slum dwellers are feeling left out, bringing to the fore wide gashes in India's social fabric. Based on personal interviews, field trips and research, Dilip Hiro weaves a narrative out of the stories of the ordinary and extraordinary Indians about how globalization has affected the country and its many children, both home and away.
